An Interview with Author

David A. Robertson

From the award-winning author of On the Trapline, When We Were Alone, and the Kirkus starred review The Barren Grounds – part of The Misewa Saga series, comes a cinematic fantasy-adventure story for young readers inspired by Indigenous legends. In this interview, David A. Robertson shares how his books keep Indigenous stories and folklore alive, what it’s like to be recognized by major children’s book awards in Canada, and how he determines what age range and format to deliver his stories.

In past interviews, you’ve spoken about the importance of keeping Indigenous stories and folklore alive. How do books like The Misewa Saga and On the Trapline and – coming soon – The Song That Called Them Home keep those Indigenous stories alive?

When my first book was published over a decade ago, Murray Sinclair, the former Canadian senator and chairman of the Indian Residential Schools Truth and Reconciliation Commission, said that we (Indigenous People) are oral storytellers, but we are finding new ways to tell stories. Through music, books, dance, and art, we are adapting but carrying on our traditions. I loved that, and I’ve kept that with me ever since. I try to accomplish a lot through my work, and one of those things is to document and share our stories, so that Indigenous kids can read them and feel inspired and empowered, and pass them down themselves, but also so non-Indigenous kids can have windows into our cultures, languages, communities, and stories. Learning about ourselves and each other is reconciliation.
So much of your work is about parents and kids, their relationships, and the secrets or hidden pasts the younger generation uncovers, whether it's the relationship with Moshom in On the Trapline or the connection with foster parents – and, eventually, the return of Morgan's birth parents – in The Misewa Saga. What interests you in exploring this parent-child dynamic?

It’s how we learn about ourselves. That connection is the most important way we learn about ourselves, and the lives of those that came before us, which informs our identities. The parent-child, grandparent-grandchild dynamic is powerful, and I want to encourage kids to learn as much as they can from the older generations while they can, to never lose history, no matter who you are. But on the flip side – because kids are learning so much now – they can teach the older generations what they are learning, and that can help our communities as well. So, there’s a lot to unpack, but any way you unpack it, it’s vitally important to recognize the roles, and to embrace them.

On the Trapline was a really personal work, for both you and the book’s illustrator, Julie Flett. How does it feel to see it recognized by major children's book awards in Canada, like the Governor General's Literary Award and, most recently, the TD Canadian Children’s Literature Award?

Well…it’s hard to quantify that, because I know that awards are subjective. There are a lot of books that are great every year, and many don’t receive any awards. At the same time, I’m really humbled and honored. And for a book like this one, I feel like it’s such an ongoing tribute to my father, and Julie’s father, that I can look past the subjectivity and feel really good about it. I think Dad would be proud. He would’ve been anyway, but it was hard not to picture him in the audience when I won the TD, for example, with a look of quiet pride. It feels nice.

You work in so many different genres and formats and age levels. When you have a good idea, how do you know with what age range or format that idea would work best?

It’s case by case. Sometimes I have an idea, develop it, and as I form it into something, I get a clear sense of who the story is best suited for. Sometimes it’s deliberately for a certain audience, like when I wrote The Theory of Crows. That was always an adult book. Mostly, it’s looking at what gaps there are right now, how can I fill those gaps, and who needs to have books that carry a particular message. That’s how When We Were Alone came about. As for different forms and genres, I think it allows me to reach a wider audience, and that’s important for my goals as a writer and what I want to share, but it also challenges me, and that makes me better at what I do. We always should be in a constant pursuit of improvement. To be better today than we were yesterday.

You started writing The Barren Grounds, the first book in The Misewa Saga, well over five years ago. What has changed most about the storyline from its inception until now?

Not that much, actually! I had the trilogy planned out from the start. It has things to say about the world we live in, and as time goes by, those subtle messages that were laced into the narrative might change a bit, but the story hasn’t changed. It always was going to end the way it ended, for the initial trilogy. It was always going to be about foster care, climate change, bullying, etc. There were also things I didn’t want to address. For example, I wrote The Great Bear in the midst of the pandemic, and at one point I thought – writing a scene where a bunch of kids are together – should they be wearing masks? But books are escapism, among other things, and I didn’t want kids to read about kids wearing masks (even though I was supportive of masking). That’s not what the series was about. Maybe... that was a bit of fantasy on Earth, but who cares? Sometimes we need to forget about tough things; sometimes we need to learn about them.

__There's a fourth book in The Misewa Saga coming soon – The Star Woman. What can you tell us about it, at this early stage?__

Not much. I suppose I can say that I had ideas for more stories, in the event that The Barren Grounds did well. When it did better than anybody expected it to, it became evident early on that we had the opportunity to do more books. So that enabled me to take the ideas I had and construct them into a second trilogy. Same characters, linear storyline, but now the focus is on Eli. The question I wanted to investigate in the second set of books in The Misewa Saga is “how can Eli open portals?” It’s really an investigation into his unique heritage. And through the story of that heritage, as it unfolds, I get to address a few more social issues.
Pizza and Taco Rock Out! (Book 5)
Stephen Shaskan
Random House Books for Young Readers
Lower Elementary

Besties Pizza and Taco are ready to rock out! They have a cool band name! And some instruments – sort of. Songs? Well, even without mad musical skills, how hard can it be? Pizza and Taco think they have all the ingredients to rock the scene. But maybe this garage band should stay in the garage.

This hilarious young graphic novel, with chapters, will tickle the funny bones of kids ages 5-8 and bolster their reading confidence. Young graphic chapter books are a great step on the way to graphic novels and longer chapter books.

(And Not Get Eaten)
Rachel Poliquin
Tundra Books • Lower Elementary
In the Polite Predators nonfiction series, each book highlights a different predator and predatorial style, from ambush to scavenging.

In the second book of this hilarious nonfiction series, Celeste is a cockroach, and everyone knows that cockroaches are survivors, so who better to give advice on surviving an encounter with a polite predator? High teas are dainty meals with pretty teacups. But Ruby the hyena is loud, ferocious, and tends to slobber.

Using her vast knowledge of hyenas, Celeste comes up with lots of strategies to get through high tea in one piece. Many of her suggestions are dangerous, most are absurd, but all are based on true hyena biology and hunting behavior.
